

Chris

Chris just turned sixteen and is excited to find his first job. For 30 years, his father worked in the town's steel mill and is now a supervisor. Even though Chris' father has offered him a position at the mill, Chris thinks he would like to work at a place that interests him more. Chris understands that he's never had a job before and that the work he finds will most likely be entry level.

After searching the internet Chris finds an advertisement for a position at a fast food restaurant. The ad states that the job pays $8 per hour and has a flexible schedule that is friendly to students. Chris is excited to have found this job because he is looking forward to saving enough money for a new mountain bike. He is confident that a newer bike will allow him to ride faster at the local mountain bike trails.

Chris quickly realized that his first job required training because the processes for making food are complex.

Even though Chris is only able to work in the afternoons and on weekends he is beginning to understand the differences between being a customer and a worker. As a consumer, he would order his food, pay for it and eat it. As a producer, he receives the food orders, prepares them and delivers them to the customer.
